Excerpt from McGill University Gazette, Vol. 7: December 15th, 1883 The importance of a thorough University training, as the groundwork for a professional education, is becoming every year more apparent. This may be said in one sense to apply more particularly to those who purpose to enter the Church or go to the Bar, since in both of these cases a more varied and general knowledge is necessary than in some others. From another point of view, however, it applies with equal force to all the professions. Mental powers are in many respects subject to the same rules, and require the same treatment as physical powers, to bring them into the highest state of efficiency. The athlete, who by a long course of systematic training, has cultivated his physical powers and brought them under perfect control, will leave far behind another who is naturally his superior, but whose powers are untrained.
